Overcome Shame

Begin with your favorite Induction and Deepener from Hypnotic World.

Just take another few moments to enjoy and benefit from this truly profound state of relaxation as you find yourself searching within to discover what it is that you would most like to achieve from this session.

Ask yourself what you most wish to experience or feel as a result of this session and then envisage what that would actually look like, as embodied by you.

Perhaps you can ask yourself, who would notice first, should your very best hopes for this hypnotic session be achieved.

Perhaps you are wondering what might be the signs this person would detect in you.

Will it show in your face, your demeanour, the way you carry yourself or the way you walked into the room.

Maybe it is something in your smile or your eyes or will they observe a change in your conversation.

And then you might wonder what you would see in them that might tell you that they had noticed that change.

Would they comment or would the signs be evident in their expression?

Perhaps you are wondering what it might feel like to observe their positive reaction, or approval, however small or subtle.

Through these nuanced imaginings and wonderings, we show our subconscious mind the direction in which we wish to travel, using images that signpost our wishes and preferred outcomes whilst alleviating anxiety and worry and gently slowing the every-day meanderings and chatter of the mind.

In our busy, modern world, we sometimes forget what it is like to allow ourselves to simply ‘be’, rather than ‘do’.

Great emphasis today is placed upon our constantly ‘doing’; and, while this is not all bad, it is important to counteract that constant state of ‘doing’ with periods of simply ‘being’.

Ask yourself, when was the last time you took the time to stop everything.

To simply lie or sit, still and quiet. No TV, no phone, just you, in quiet contemplation.

Often, for many of us, quiet moments – waiting in the queue at the supermarket or sitting down and enjoying a cup of tea or coffee - see us instantly and automatically reaching for our screens and absentmindedly checking for emails or messages, or looking up the weather, or scrolling through social media.

If we are not looking at a screen, we may be making mental lists of upcoming tasks to be accomplished.

These habits of the modern world, however, whilst inevitable, are not restful habits.

In fact, they can have a profound impact on our thought processes and, therefore, our levels of happiness, confidence and wellbeing.

Here and now, in this very moment, and while you are sitting or lying there quietly, just listening to the sound of my voice, perhaps you can become more aware of your breathing as it deepens and slows in tempo.

This is true relaxation.

Here and now you are truly practising the art of just ‘being’ and allowing yourself to be content with being.

As you absorb that knowledge and gain strength from it, you can begin to recognise that this very process is much needed and deserved by you.

And here and now, no-one wants anything of you and nothing is expected of you, all that you need to do is focus on my voice and continue to embrace the peacefulness that comes from that shift in focus as you drift deeper, and deeper still.

Short pause.

Engaging in this simple practice, for just a few moments every day, goes a long, long way toward counteracting the effect of the constant, never-ending flow of information, or data that assails our brain on a daily basis.

The truth is, in the normal course of the day as we go about our lives, rather than multi-tasking, as many of us believe we are doing, we are actually causing the brain to switch rapidly between tasks.

The brain, whilst extraordinary powerful, does not handle multiple tasks at one time but instead flip-flops rapidly between them.

Sometimes the switch from one task to another costs us only a few tenths of a second, but in a day of skipping between ideas, conversations, and transactions on a phone or computer, the mental cost of these switches can add up, and make us more error-prone, in fact, psychologists who have studied this effect, report that this shifting between tasks can use up to as much as 40% of what would otherwise be productive brain time.

In addition, every time we switch tasks, we are shooting ourselves up with a dose of the stress hormone cortisol, putting our thoughtful, rational, reasoning brain areas to sleep, and triggering the release of dopamine, a brain chemical that plays an important part in pursuing reward.

In other words, the stress we create by trying in vain to do several different things at once, and not taking time to stop, to step back, to allow time for quiet meditation, is skewing our happiness levels and causing us to crave even more interruptions, spiking the release of dopamine and perpetuating the cycle, rather like an addiction where the sufferer craves greater and greater levels of the ‘hit’ to achieve the same result.

So know that what you are doing here and now is of such benefit to you, like a balm to the mind, this window of peace will soothe an anxious brain you as drift and dream; so drift and dream.

Now, I know you've been experiencing some negative emotions connected to feelings of shame, and this is something I'd like to talk to you about.

More accurately it's something that I'd like to talk to your subconscious mind about, that deeper, inner part of the brain, the part that is believed to be the most powerful entity in the universe, the part that even our most knowledgeable, skilled scientists are only just beginning to get to grips with but are still a long way, perhaps even centuries, from fully understanding.

The subconscious mind listens even when your conscious mind has wandered.

In this wonderful, relaxed state of trance, the critical control faculty the conscious mind is bypassed; ensuring that what I'm saying will be accepted without analysis or judgement, provided it is for your benefit.

And my words will sink deeply into your subconscious mind, and begin the process of reprogramming those unwanted experiences of shame, and replacing them instead with how you would like to feel.

To begin this process of rewiring it is important to understand two things: firstly, that the subconscious mind responds to habit - that is, our habit of thought, and secondly, that the subconscious endeavours to work towards whatever is most in our focus.

Shame can be a dark, painful and unpleasant mix of regret, self-hate, dishonour, inadequacy and embarrassment.

If on a regular basis you were consciously thinking of yourself or visualising yourself in those terms, then your subconscious responds to this programming and adopts those very same thoughts as 'facts'.

What is more, it starts to feed those negative, confidence-sapping thoughts, and others similar to them, right back to you, so that, uninvited, they pop into your mind at random, as though some outside entity, deity or the universe is judging us harshly.

But these ‘beliefs’ from the deeper subconscious mind are simply the learned results of your own conscious thoughts, and the wonderful news is, that they can be changed.

So, as you continue to breathe, noticing the sound of the slow intake of breath through your nose: in – two – three – four - and out – two – three – four - perhaps you feel ready now to take up the reins and regain control of this process.

This, like any new skill, takes practice, and constant daily repetition, but we learn any new habit, or habit of thought, in a matter of just a few weeks.

When we change that message, with consistency and determination, we re-program the subconscious mind to automatically remind us of all the wonderful qualities and attributes we possess and are proud of, thereby rebuilding our confidence, our sense of self, and allowing us to once more step out proudly and hold our heads high.

Frequent relaxation, that is, making time each day for moments of being, not doing, whether using self-hypnosis or meditation, promotes this rewiring process, as well as counteracting the negative impact of constantly comparing ourselves to others.

Quiet periods of true relaxation give the brain a chance to consolidate, make sense of things, problem-solve and clarify and erase those old, unhelpful thought patterns, affording us too, the opportunity to start inputting the new program – the feelings and emotions about yourself that you truly want to feel.

So let us explore this new pathway now.

Make yourself even more relaxed and comfortable, scan the body for any remaining areas of tension and release them, and using your amazing imagination, create an image of a screen in your mind, perhaps as though it were a blackboard, or a whiteboard or even a cinema screen, expansive, blank, an empty space upon which to build.

Short pause.

And now, on this screen, I want you to list, or project onto the left-hand side, ten things about you that make you a worthy human being.

That’s right, ten things.

If this feels like an impossibility, then you more than anyone will benefit the most from this positive exercise.

Take as long as you need, and I will quieten down in a moment to allow you the time and space to focus on this.

You’ll find that once you start, this process gets easier as you activate the higher mind, the part of you that, deep down, knows your true worth and value and is proud of you.

If you find it helpful to do so, imagine the person in your life who loves you the most, being stopped in the street and asked to describe 10 things about you that they love.

Pause for a full minute.

Good.

Remember, the characteristics about you that make you the unique individual that you are.

These may include personal achievements, strengths that you have drawn upon when the going got tough, resources you’ve discovered that you didn’t even realise you had.

There may be temptations you’ve resisted, past unwanted habits you’ve overcome, keep going.

You know there are more so don’t be modest. Own up to your strengths and positive qualities.

Pause for 30 seconds.

Well done.

Now have a look at those wonderful things you’ve added to that list.

Really see them, up there, clearly marked on that formerly blank screen in your mind and take in what each of those characteristics mean; why they are important to you.

Perhaps you didn't believe you would find as many as you did.

But you now understand that the old habit of only noticing the negatives is already fading.

You have already started out on your journey toward positive change.

Now you can see, in black and white (or whatever other color lettering you imagined) that although your automatic, knee-jerk response has perhaps been to see yourself in negative terms, when you make the effort to remind yourself of all the wonderful things that make you the unique and wonderful individual that you are, you will, in future, reflect on these positives first and foremost.

We are, of course, mere humans.

We make mistakes and misjudgements and we get things wrong.

The trick here is not to deny or overlook our flaws, but instead to balance them out with the things we get right, the traits we are proud of.

For what have those feelings of shame ever accomplished?

Was it ever helpful to mire yourself in guilt and feelings of inadequacy?

They certainly weren't helpful when you didn't act to make amends, nor when you dwelled on those regrets or feelings of shame for any length of time, or on a regular basis.

When we reflect only on the negatives we recognise in our character make-up how this depletes our ability to problem-solve creatively and can lead to a dramatic loss of confidence.

More often than not, that loss of confidence, and poor sense of self, create a state of mind that is fearful and resistant to change.

And so we can become stuck, thinking the same, self-deprecating thoughts, convincing ourselves that others are judging us harshly - and changing nothing.

The truth about change is that it is hard, harder than staying the same, but the moment we strive for change is the moment we walk a different path.

This is a path that honours us from the moment we set foot upon it - the moment we take the decision or make a plan.

Simply having the courage to embark on a new, better, healthier, happier road instantly conveys a message to our subconscious mind that we are worthwhile.

It tells the subconscious mind that we matter and that we care for and about ourselves.

And that old adage about the journey being just as important as the destination becomes real manifestly applicable.

Let’s go back to that screen now.

Bring it to the forefront of your mind again, with those positive characteristics on it.

Take your time to remind yourself of them as you picture them again in your mind’s eye.

Pause for 20 seconds.

And in a few moments, as you continue to embrace this deep, powerful state of trance, I am going to ask you make some additions to that list, but keeping these new items separate from your original items.

Perhaps you would like to divide the screen into two columns, with your 10 items down one side, and space to add more on the other.

Pause for 20 seconds.

I’m going to be asking you to add any qualities or characteristics that you would like to possess to this other column.

There may not be many of them, or you may find there are a few.

But before you do so, it might be helpful to think of someone you admire, someone who appears to you to be all the things you aspire to.

This might be a family member, a work colleague, a character from a book or a movie or someone you haven't yet met or someone you admire from the side-lines.

Pause for 20 seconds.

Good, that's excellent.

And now, using that other column on the screen of your inner mind, take a few moments to add the characteristics and qualities in this person, real or imaginary, that you admire and aspire to.

Pause for 20 seconds.

Well done, that's good.

And now, continuing to draw on those wonderful creative powers of yours, see if you can project forward in time, just a little way into the future, when you've made some changes, and have moved closer to what and where you want to be, to when you are actually embodying those changes.

Pause for 20 seconds.

You can just picture yourself going about your life on an 'ordinary' day, except that, nothing is ordinary because you are different.

You have started to believe.

You hold your head high and step out into the world after choosing to create a new reality, through some simple changes in your thoughts.

You are amazing.

Instead of those old feelings of shame, you feel a sense of pride and love for yourself, a sense of quiet inner confidence that, as confidence does, shines out in your every expression and stance and movement and is absorbed and recognised, albeit subconsciously, by others around you.

We are all instinctively drawn to those around us who have chosen to love and accept themselves: unwittingly, they attract us, regardless of their appearance or life experiences.

They draw us toward them magnetically because they tell us, at a subliminal level, that they are worth loving, that they have built a solid core of self-believe which exists independently of others' approval.

This is true of all mammals, including humans, but as humans, we have the power to consciously change the messages we give ourselves, the language we use about ourselves, and therefore, the power to implement profound change.

So take a few moments now to absorb these wonderful feelings and the positive changes that are already taking place at a subconscious level.

If there was anything you did, said or thought in the past of which you are not proud, know that we all make mistakes and be kind to yourself.

Forgive yourself now and let those old feelings go as you make room for your feelings of pride and love for yourself.

Remember your quiet, inner sense of confidence and focus on this screen, where all of your positive qualities are listed, and invite you to believe in yourself, and your own sense of self-worth.

This list represents you and you are you.

You are a kind, loving, wonderful, unique individual and you are proud of your qualities and you are proud to be you.

In a moment, I'm going to count the numbers from 1 to 5 and when I reach 5, you will return to a normal state of awareness, feeling somehow different, more confident and more optimistic and happier and completely free from those old, unwanted negative feelings.
